Ryland Peters & Small
When writer and artist Philippa Stockley bought her tiny Georgian house at auction, it needed just about everything doing to it, but -- as with most artists -- money was tight. So, all the things she could tackle herself, she did. Not only did this save money, but she could control the pace of work and what materials were being used and help save the planet by saying no to needless plastics, aggressive chemicals, and unnecessary waste. Stockley shares projects from her own house to inspire you to create something in yours, using natural materials, recycling and reusing where possible. There are approximately eighteen illustrated step-by-step projects of varying complexity and styles, showing how to create and make in your own home. Have a go. Making stuff is magical.
